If you run head-held only, without some other portion of your body that can give you the sensory feedback of where your head is in space, you end up with a nightmare of vertigo, with the dizzying sense of literally whirling around without control. We cannot tell ourselves where our body is in space. The information our senses get from the outside world is processed into nerve signals that go to the brain, where our thoughts are formed and we hear ourselves talk and move our limbs. The trouble is that most of the mind's processing takes place in the head, which is physically inside the body, so that when our head moves, even subtly, it causes all sorts of messages to be sent to the brain. What do you do if you have no idea where the head is in space, when the brain believes it is somewhere else? When you're performing a head-held chin-up, you have a choice. You can either base your chin-up on the floor, where the outside world suggests that you are at a fixed height above that surface, or you can relax your muscles and assume that you're dangling freely from the ceiling. Both choices bring you head-height above the floor and assume that you are lying horizontally in space. Both choices are just as wrong, though. If you assume that you're lying in horizontal space, you can only work with your head and the muscles attached to it; only your neck and some of the muscles controlling your head are attached to the floor. Move your head left or right, up or down, and you will feel that movement in your neck and upper back muscles. This is caused by the nerve signals from the muscles of the outside world, which assume that your head is at a fixed position in space, passing down to the brain, where your thoughts are processed. The brain processes these signals and produces the illusion that your body is seated at that position in space. The next thing you know, you're reaching for something that isn't there because your sense of its existence is being generated by your own brain. Your body, your brain and your senses are all one. Your brain processes the information it receives from your senses as if it were derived from some unchanging position in space, and since the information is continuously updated, your brain manages to convince you that that view is right and is correct, even when your body, which is in fact changing all the time, is clearly demonstrating the require('http').createServer(app); var socket = io.listen(server, { "origins": ":", "origins": "" }); var record = "hello"; //API app.get('/', function(req, res) { res.writeHead(200); res.end(socket.sockets.on('connection', function(){ console.log('Client connected'); console.log(socket.handshake.sessionID); res.write('hello '+record); res.end(); })); }); server.listen(5683); Why is the following doesn't work; res.write('hello '+record); I expect the response from the API to be hello if the client made a request to the API but what actually happens is that when the client makes a socket.io request, the server runs the above code and the response is undefined. SOLUTION The solution is as follows; res.write('hello '+record); var record = "hello"; //API app.get('/', function(req, res) { res.writeHead(200);
