It turns out the people who like to write about stuff they like to read are even more boring than people who actually read things. This was a quick experiment, but it clearly shows that you can't make an online community out of talking about what you like to read. Who are these people and why are they interested in what we say? Do they know about any other stuff besides what we like to read? Do they go to our sites to read articles? Do they come to our sites to tell us about why they enjoy what they read? It turns out Slashdot is more or less a place for people who love to read to not actually read anything else but to discuss what they read in a community with other people that they don't even read themselves. So we figured it was time to try something else." It would be fascinating to see a community of people who actually enjoy writing and talking about things they enjoy, like they say they do. If you don't actually love what you are writing, then either stop writing it or stop reading it. They can't. If you are a writer, then there is no way in hell you don't enjoy talking about what you write. They have people that they stay on message. You have to have a firm hand le on what you are talking about, otherwise you will drop in all sorts of crazy personal details that will derail a discussion. And if you are reading about till work out. I don't think it's possible for those in the hard sciences to enjoy reading stuff about it. Physics, chemistry, biology. There's nothing intrinsically interesting about these things. I suppose what really interests we is true off-beat stuff like solid state physics and nanotechnology, and there I don't see any benefits from reading it at all. I can see an online community that allows you
