“When we started work on FIFA, we put a lot of focus on ball physics, player movement and player feeling,” said David Rutter, Head of Physical Play. “With player animation, we wanted to make sure players would move naturally on the pitch and react to what they see and feel. “With FIFA, we put a lot of focus on gameplay. The subtle animations in the pitch such as handballs, horseplay and off-ball actions, or the quick-paced and match-changing stuff on the ball, we’ve tried to make sure the game also makes sense, at the highest level. “With the introduction of HyperMotion Technology we’ve taken a big step forward in terms of generating believable interactions on the pitch.” Rutter said that in training and gameplay, where most player animations last about 200 milliseconds, HyperMotion enables more than five times the number of animations to be performed. The goal is to smooth out any rough edges that traditional animations introduce. “If you watch the reaction times of some of the more common ball-related actions, they’re usually less than 150 milliseconds,” said Rutter. “What we’ve created is around 600-700 milliseconds, which means that we can now create a number of animations that can only be done with motion capture. “This means a player running along the byline, getting beaten to the ball, jumping for a header, for example. This gives us something to work with that you can only get with motion capture.” FIFA 22 incorporates HyperMotion Technologies into a wide variety of situations, ranging from situations such as running with the ball, jumping, tackling or goal celebrations. “The goal celebrations, for example, are now much more authentic. You can see how the celebrations of the likes of Messi, Ronaldo, Neymar, Hazard and others are unique to the individual,” said Rutter. “Those small little motions like the extending of your hands to touch the ball, or bringing that foot up into the line of the shot and lifting it to hit the ball, are all a real part of how these players play and we wanted to make sure we could capture those motions. "When you see that sort of celebration with a knee slide, you know why it's important that we've been able to capture that motion
