A YEAR ago, Troy Dean, 20, was born with the vestiges of a disease known as amorphous eosinophilic peritonitis, which have meant he has had to endure a battery of different surgeries and chemotherapy to correct the condition. Troy and his parents, Connie and Dean Rafferty, from Kilcoole, Co Wicklow, have been fundraising to see if the expensive treatment could be stopped at the root. Troy Dean with Connie and Dean Rafferty Doctors are hopeful the 22-year-old may be able to stop chemo in the next four to six weeks, according to his parents. But before they can treat Troy's oesophagus, a section of the windpipe that links to the stomach, they have to find a way of removing the infected cells from his abdomen and lungs. "We've had three surgeries, we've had three rounds of chemo and it's not been a pleasant way to go through life," says Troy. "But what we've decided to do is raise awareness and money for people to be able to actually do something about this because it's horrendous." He was diagnosed with the condition when he was just five months old and had his first surgery at that age. "They did a laparoscopic procedure where they go in through the navel and they open up the belly," he explains. "The doctor put a tube in there and the nasty stuff came out. I was in the hospital for a week and it took a year to get back to my regular life." Last year he had his first round of chemotherapy to try and kill off the bacteria and the inflammatory cells that
