This invention relates to apparatus for testing electrical apparatus, and more particularly to apparatus for testing the conductivity of a welding electrode and wire, thereby to eliminate welding defects. It is well known that automatic welding apparatus, such as automatic welding robots, when running properly must be provided with certain electrical apparatus to insure the effective operation of the welding apparatus. For example, an electrical resistance sensor is often provided to measure the welding current applied to the welding electrode and wire. If the welding electrode and wire are not properly connected to the welding apparatus, the welding current applied to the welding electrode and wire will be dissipated into the workpiece, thereby causing the workpiece to be drawn away from the welding electrode and wire and not melted. It is also known that automatic welding apparatus must be provided with a heat source to melt the workpiece to be welded. The heat source must be produced in close thermal contact with the workpiece, and this may be achieved by providing the welding electrode and wire with a heat-conducting element to conduct the heat from the heat source to the welding electrode and wire. In an automatic welding apparatus, the welding electrode and wire are not only conductors of electrical current, but also conductors of heat to which the workpiece is subjected. Proper welding electrode and wire conductivity is of critical importance. Welding defects, such as unmelted workpiece and spatter on the welded surface, are caused by a defective welding electrode and wire which do not conduct heat adequately to the workpiece. It has long been known in the art that it is desirable to confirm that the welding electrode and wire are properly connected to the welding apparatus and are supplying adequate heat thereto. One approach to confirm the electrode and wire heat conductivity has been the use of a resistive heater switch to monitor the electrical resistance of the electrode and wire. If the resistance drops below a certain level, this indicates that the electrode and wire are short circuited by some defect which has permitted the electrical current to flow to the workpiece. It is desired that the apparatus for confirming the electrode and wire

A series of twelve N-amino-4-methylcyclohexanol derivatives and of twelve N-amino-2-methylcyclohexanol derivatives were prepared and evaluated for photocytotoxic (PSC) and phototoxic (PTT) activities. Some of these compounds were more effective than the reference compound m-AMT in both assays. Among them, 5-((5-(5-methoxy-2-nitrobenzyl)-1,
