Are there any resources for understanding the purpose and process of proofs during site edits? Specifically, are proofs generally just written up in a comment, or does the proposer have to make the justification for the edit clear? A: An edit as an edit proof is done by someone who has at least 2K reputation. See the FAQ How do suggested edits work? for more details. More specifically, from that question: We want to make it so that, as long as the edits meet our quality guidelines, users are free to edit any post at will, while still requiring reviewers to take the time to look over these suggested edits and approve or reject them. As Matt noted, typically, reviewers look at the edit and try to guess what the previous user had in mind. If they think it's an improvement, they approve it. A: For now, this is how it works: The review system isn't perfect, but in most cases, it isn't too bad (80-95% pass rate, though that's a bit of a misleading statistic since it only holds for edits that have been reviewed at least once, so it's skewed towards edits that haven't been reviewed yet). Edits are designed to undo inappropriate or incorrect changes to posts. Edits introduce new changes. Edits that only change a very minor aspect of the post, such as changing a space for a period, are usually not approved, because they just aren't likely to improve the post. Any edit that is done by someone with less than 2K reputation
