Smart Localization - IE7 includes built in locale support. You can make use of it to support your multilingual websites or applications. There are three ways to support multiple languages. First, you can add the .mozL10n CSS style to apply localized styles for HTML contents. You can set the language group, and the specific languages at the same time. .mozL10n also sets the language of the context menu. For more details, please refer to the this document: The second way is to add the msgstr key-value pairs to your HTML. This will make your website context-sensitive for every user's different language. The third way is to use the built in localization service provided by IE. You can create a localized version of your HTML contents, add a set of new messages that were not found in the original version, and make the browser automatically re-translate the contents. In addition to the built-in localization support, IE7 also has the IE Tab French localization and the IME support. With the French localization, you can run IE7 in the French environment (i.e. Non-English language). IE Tab French localization is a tool that can easily be used for developers. With this tool, you can preview the contents in the French language. The French language comes from the French version of IE. Instead, I suggest you to install Opera, which is a cross-platform web browser and uses the WebKit engine. In this comparison of IE7 and Opera 9, we see that both browsers display pages approximately the same, although Opera 9 can be set to a higher quality level. To some extent, this is confirmed by the earlier view of overall performance. One of the first things that you will notice is the elegant and clean appearance of the tabs, which is very similar to Internet Explorer. It is possible to customize the color of the tab background and the appearance of the tab text. In terms of usability, Opera 9 makes use of somewhat less mouse-based gestures than does IE. The tab strip is not mouse friendly, which requires more accidental clicks. But the mouse gestures are more than adequate in this browser. When it comes to functionality, the two browsers are on an equal footing. The most obvious difference is that, unlike IE, Opera does not include Office integration. The use of toolbars is another difference between the two browsers. Not only does

What's New in the IE Snapshot?

Internet Explorer web browser snapshot is a software application, which helps people capture a particular web page or a part of it and save it to the computer, so that you can further analyze it. The installation process is typical, and after you complete it, you come face to face with a simple and highly intuitive interface. It closely resembles the layout of a web browser, along with back, forward, stop, refresh and home buttons, and a preview panel. In order to save a web page to your computer, as a multi-page PDF or as a picture, all you have to do is input the appropriate URL, select the part that interests you (or do not select anything in order to grab the whole picture) and click the "Save" or "Create new PDF" button. From the settings panel, you can choose the output directory, format and filename type (manually or automatically - date, time and page name). It is also possible to choose the compression quality, include a custom header with user-defined font type, size, foreground and background, as well as input X, Y, width and height, so as to automate the selection. There are no Help contents, yet seeing how easy it is to use this software tool, it becomes apparent they are not actually needed. CPU and memory usage is moderate-to low, and response time is good. Taking all of this into consideration, we can safely say IE Snapshot is a useful piece of software for people interested in capturing pages from URL lists, which does not put a strain on your computer's resources.
