The Federal Government's post-conflict planning is not losing a beat. Government IT director Russ Machtinger, who is the new acting director of the new Federal CIO Office, says it's a matter of moving systems into the future. The new National Network Operations Center (NNOC) was launched in May at the Department of Homeland Security. It uses a distributed architecture based on a network of "containers" to run applications and securely share data. Over the next five years, the NNOC is designed to scale from 200 containers to an eventual capacity of 100,000. The system will enable the Department of Homeland Security to better identify and respond to threats. "The cloud is changing the way organizations operate. As the agency's cyber program moves into the cloud, it will grow significantly," said US DHS Deputy Under Secretary for Cybersecurity & Communications Mike Stone. "We need to be able to share threat information across the entire federal landscape. The NNOC is well-suited to meet the promise and potential of cloud c6a93da74d
