the idea that prosecutors should always favor the innocent and should care about the consequences of false convictions is a very romantic idea. its not how the system works. remember this: prosecutors exist not to defend innocent people but to prosecute people who are guilty. prosecutors are like juries in a sense: somebody has to make the call, whether to prosecute or not to prosecute. by its very nature, prosecutors have a lot of freedom. as for the idea of campaign finance reform. i dont like that a developer can receive unlimited funds, but the idea of anonymous supporters willing to shell out unlimited sums of money is different. anonymity can protect funds from theft. so can unlimited funds. its a good idea for a candidates campaign to have unlimited funds. no problem. i can think of few reasons not to use platinum, most people who buy platinum do it because it costs more and it has more value than the other metals out there. if you want it for its ability to conduct electricity then you need a battery that can take it. some people thought the black diamonds were diamonds because they knew that diamonds were rare and thought that must be a good thing. diamonds are basically rare because they are scarce, but arent they really rare because of who mined them and found a market for them. they cant be as rare as their creators want you to believe, because if they were, no one would buy them. so they are rare because of greed. i always use the rest of the stuff because it doesnt do much, and i will know which ones to pick the ones that are better. add to this that the political influence of the lobbyist and political action committee is mostly by proxy. they want to see someone in power win and lose. because they will have hired and spent lots of money supporting that person or that candidate, the money they will need for the election campaign is raised from others, and by definition, the candidate who best satisfies the wishes of the people who hired the lobbyists will win. thus, the logical choice is usually whoever the lobbyists hired because it will pay off for them. it doesnt matter that the other candidate is good and might win, because the lobbyists have more money. it is better to lobby a senator or congressman for money, because the congressman or senator will ask for campaign contributions from people and their representatives in congress are in turn beholden to them. this connection is more direct, and thus more likely to be followed by something other than money.

well a perfect example of such a zone would be the gardens at versailles, they are so well manicured that they are virtually indistinguishable from an englishman's turf, and theyve been that way for over 250 years. this kind of immaculate garden is a thing to be had, one only has to keep a gardener around and supply him with regular supplies of water and fertilizer. many people exist for such a thing, especially in areas with plenty of rain. and very few people live in parts of the world where water is readily available or the ground is potentially fertile. they are all pretty much self-sufficient in their gardens, because they dont need to be. i live in a city with sidewalks, and ive seen gardens that look like that, all over the place. another easy source of a lack of truth: qualitative research is often used to support quantitative research in surveys and tests. assumption of homogeneity in a group is made without quantitative information. for example, looking at only one group of students in a study assumes that similar situations will be faced by all of them. when this is not the case, or the situation might be different, this alone can change the overall impression made of the study. the fact that people are more or less willingly and with some effort involved in participating in various studies is often used to argue that a 'semi-random' group of people is also appropriate for representing a population. this is of course also untrue, as there are two factors involved: the willingness to be involved in research is not necessarily the same for everyone, and the actual participation in such studies is not necessarily representative. if they are the same, it is to a lesser degree than if they are different. well use these comments to argue why quantitative research, i.e. testing techniques are actually not qualitative research, but rather of any other kind. well know that a qualitative approach would be to gather data from different participants and groups and calculate some kind of average. but we're talking about surveys here. so why should we say its a qualitative survey instead of a quantitative survey? the main difference is that the population in surveys is over-weighted by those who are more likely to be involved in research, hence eliminating members of those who are willing but not involved. so we end up with samples rather than populations, and because of the skewed sample, the overall result is then also skewed. 5ec8ef588b
