*generally the Epson printhead should not reach its end-of-life until after a minimum of 8 or more complete sets of cartridge changes; Epson Workforce/WF Pro models typically have a higher print page throughput average over entry-level printer models, but this is not always the case. While some printheads may last 15,000+ pages others may only last 3000 pages, actual results will vary. The printhead will eventually fail in time from an internal micro-electronics failure due to the following leading factors: general customer print usage and printer care, printer duty cycle (i.e. # pages printed per month), printing frequency (i. time between each print job), print mode (i. draft vs. normal) and content printed (i. photos vs plain pages) and color mode (black and white only vs. color/greyscale printing). Paper types used (i. plain paper, photo papers & matte/heavy bond papers) and paper edge curl (due to age in printer or low relative humidity) can also quickly lead to premature printhead failures due to physical head strikes of the paper edges making repeated contact with the printhead nozzle plate. If you did not already know Epson build directly into their printers (included Epson Stylus NX420W printer) a system where by Epson Stylus NX420W printer will stop working and require attention from a service center to get them functioning again.
