the facial recognition ability of cameras has also been increasingly touted by the chinese authorities. since 2013, the mps has been piloting a project to deploy face-recognition software in selected public areas, and since 2015, it has been using it to oversee public security in sixty-four key cities. in june 2016, the mps organized a competition to develop a facial-recognition system that could identify criminals and potential terrorist. the winning system, called the certainty technology, was developed by a team at the shanghai institute of optics and fine mechanics (siom) and placed first in a three-year contest. since 2016, the shanghai government has invested in the system, creating an oversight committee and inviting siom to work on new products, including a new facial-recognition software called bioid. in 2017, the mps launched another facial-recognition pilot program in guangzhou, chengdu, and hangzhou. in these pilot projects, surveillance cameras equipped with facial-recognition software will be located at public transit hubs, ports, and public events, and the facial-recognition algorithms will be developed by siom. 15 in addition to face-recognition software and the ability to identify people by their voices, the chinese government is also increasingly able to distinguish foreigners and identify them by their accents. officials from the public security bureau of shanghai, for example, claimed that the citys police force could identify foreign students with the aid of a newly developed artificial intelligence program. 45 the police can match the voice of an offender captured over a phone call with a sample recorded from a foreign student. in addition, a speech-recognition system called the student voice service was launched in 2014, allowing police to automatically recognize foreign students in the process of being arrested for suspected crimes. a similar technology, the baidu voice analysis system, is also being deployed to monitor the actions of banned foreign organizations. 46 5ec8ef588b
