grown up in St. Louis, studied art in Paris before being hired to work for the New York World. He moved to New York in 1915 to take a position at the New York Evening World and quickly became a rising star in the art world. A simple letter introducing himself to Lincoln Steffens, a self-styled muckraking journalist, resulted in an offer from Steffens to cover the campaign. (In response, the President of the United States offered to look after Steffens' personal interests.) In the late summer of 1916, he designed the posters for the Machine Gun Corps, telling reporters that he created the work in less than five days. According to his biographer, he had " painted over a hundred posters and created twenty-six by August, 1917." By that time, he had already left the campaign to join the infantry and begun to see his art as his job, reflecting his sharpened sense of purpose. "It was obvious," he wrote later, "that the Allies had a mere scrap of time before the Germans would put an end to the war." During the war, he became something of a celebrity, solicited by the American Red Cross to paint posters to promote the sale of Liberty bonds. At the end of the war, he was commissioned to reproduce war photographs of fallen soldiers in cheap postcards. His final project was the famous poster, "The Mother of Democracy," an image of the Virgin Mary that appeared everywhere at the close of the war. When he had left the Wilson campaign, he explained, he had "offer the President service as a propagandist."
